Abstract: The 'global village' is today experiencing a wave of polarization and insecurity on a scale possibly not experienced since the end of the second-world war. The recent and much discussed United Kingdom's exit from the EU (Brexit) and the election of President Donald Trump in the United States have been associated with heightened nationalistic and anti-Muslim sentiments within these countries. While both events may also be attributed to increasing inequality, unemployment and poverty within specific sub-groups in both countries, a clear result has been the increase in societal polarization and negative tensions directed against immigrants and Muslim sub-groups/cultures.

In Europe, the experience of societal polarization has been accentuated by Brexit and the nascent Trump administration. The recently concluded presidential and parliamentary elections in Austria and the Netherlands (respectively); the ongoing politicking towards the soon-to-occur French presidential elections; and the build-up to the German federal elections in the fall of 2017 all provide clear examples of how socially polarizing 'identity-based' political ideologies are driving a wedge between sub-groups in our societies. Religion, race and immigrant/native pedigree appear to have a stronger say now - than at any other time in the past 70 years - in defining acceptance, belonging and inclusion in the European nation-state.

Norway is not isolated from this increasingly globalized narrative. Some people are of the opinion that the past four years with a far-right party as an active player in the sitting government may have contributed to increasing societal polarization in the Norwegian society, in line with the observable trends in Europe and the United States of America. This means that religion, ethnicity and immigrant/native status may now be playing a larger role (than many are ready to admit) in defining how individuals, groups and sub-cultures are perceived, accepted and included in the Norwegian society. One predictable result of this being increasing distrust and polarization in the society.

IofC is an organization that aims to build bridges of trust across the world's divides. Learning to live together is central to how we can move closer to this goal, whether as individuals, in families, within the larger society and even internationally. It is our hope that the visit and open seminar with H.E. Ambassador Ms. Lamia Radi will inspire us and will provide us with an extra impetus to speak more with each other in-order to combat increasing social polarization and build trust in Norway, in Europe, and in the world in general.
